

respondents do not perceive Russia as an autocratic country, without democratic traditions. The most graphic confirmation of this perception is the experience of those who support or oppose membership. Only 17% of respondents believe that those political structures which support the membership are doing that sincerely and from the belief that it is good for the country and citizens. Contrary to that, 52% of respondents believe that those who oppose the membership are doing that sincerely and for patriotic reasons. All of the results clearly show that there are alternative models of communication with young people in our society. In addition, there are sufficient arguments that claim that young people are uncritically accepting some traditional values on which they are projecting their actions in the present.
